Vendredi 24 Oct, Newman Room (St Aldate's), 17h30

Robert Charlebois est un symbole dans son Québec natal, aux côtés de Félix Leclerc et de Gilles Vigneault. Il est aussi l'un des chanteurs francophones les plus aimés en France, tout comme dans l'ensemble du monde francophone. Artiste complet, dans le sens plein du terme, il est à la fois auteur-compositeur-interprète, musicien et acteur. Son univers musical au cours d'une carrière qui s'écoule sur cinquante ans regorge de trésors avec des chansons cultes comme "Je rêve à Rio", "Je reviendrai à Montréal" et "Lindberg". Il reviendra sur sa carrière et nous parlera de ses projets.

2 Calls for Papers

2.1 Call for applications: Global Humanitarianism | Research Academy

Deadline: 31 December 2014, please see attachment for details.

 Please see item 2.1 attachment for further information:*

<https://weblearn.ox.ac.uk/x/LHZOeG>

2.2 A Poetry Reader: Call for Papers for articles and translation of poetry

A Poetry Reader journal is a transcultural and experimental online journal that covers literatures in different cultural and national groups. It intends to connect poetry to any possibilities, including deconstruction, trauma studies, gender studies, religion, philosophy, and science. There are two sections in the journal: critical articles and translation. The former one will establish a platform for the readers to understand the foreign works unfamiliar to them, while the latter aims to encounter the works directly by reducing any scholarly interpretation. Now we gladly announce the Call for Paper for our first issue. The received article can be experimental, interdisciplinary, or transcultural. The journal has no specific themes, but would like to introduce:

1. The famous foreign works in the English world.
2. The unnoticed foreign works that will enrich the world literature.
3. The relatively unknown English poetry that should have drawn more attention.
4. The reputed English poetry that creates new perspectives.

The first deadline of all the submissions is 10th January 2015. The article should be typed in single-space lines, no longer than 6000 words, including bi-lingual citation, bibliography, and footnotes. The abstract should be about 300 words. The author should avoid identifying themselves in the contexts. Use Romanisation for the translation of foreign terms, along with parentheses to enclose the original language. The year of works and authors of the first literature should be noted. For example, the Japanese name is advisable to put in this way: Matsuo Basho (松尾芭蕉, 1644- 1694). Contributors are free to adopt any formats (Chicago, MLA, etc.). After being successfully accepted, the essay is encouraged to change into MLA.

The translation of foreign poetry, either contemporary or classic, aims to discover the local poets who have received great honour in their home countries but have not been published in English yet. The contemporary poetry allows the readers to understand the taste and the main concerns in different countries; the classics, on the other side, will show a glimpse of the specific literary history. The poetry translation is encouraged to offer at least 3 pages in single space, with original language on the left side and translation on the right. The fundamental introduction of the poet and the works are required in order to show critical evaluation to the non-native readers. It is necessary to have the poet's permission to publish, or the publishing house's permission for the edited works of the deceased poet.

Also, A Poetry Reader would like to invite other editors/ reviewers who are familiar to join our editorial board. The work of the reviewers will be quite easy; they, after receiving a specific article assigned to them, will decide if the journal will accept it or not. The successful submission will need some editing work before publishing.

For any enquiries and submissions of articles, please send a letter to us by email:

poetryreader2015@gmail.com.

2.3 Call for Papers - Critical Philosophy of Race: Beyond the USA

Call for papers for a proposed special issue of the Journal of Applied Philosophy.

Since the publication in 1992 of Professor Kwame Anthony Appiah's In My Father's House: Africa in the Philosophy of Culture, the new discipline of the Critical Philosophy of Race has flourished among Anglophone 'analytic' philosophers. Yet Critical Philosophers of Race have tended to confine themselves to an analysis of racial problems that arise in the politics, and against the historical background, of the USA. This focus has given the false impression that the Critical Philosophy of Race is irrelevant outside the USA. To challenge this false impression, the Journal of Applied Philosophy proposes to publish a special issue, guest edited by Nathaniel Adam Tobias Coleman (UCL) and Albert Atkin (Macquarie), on the relevance of the Critical Philosophy of Race beyond the US experience.

Deadline for submissions: 31 January 2015.

Please address any initial enquiries about submissions to the guest editors:

Nathaniel Adam Tobias Coleman n.coleman@ucl.ac.uk

Albert Atkin albert.atkin@mq.edu.au

Submissions should be sent to jap@appliedphil.org

Guidelines for submissions can be found here.

Don't teach. Invest.

Education Partnerships Africa (EPAfrica) is recruiting committed and enthusiastic students to work in partnership with rural East African secondary schools in summer 2015, which marks our 25th anniversary. EPAfrica volunteers are not teachers or builders; instead they are talented individuals who immerse themselves in one school's community and try to improve the quality of education offered by designing and delivering tailor-made investment projects. The primary focus is on delivering sustainable solutions through investment in resources such as textbooks and lab equipment, while Project Workers also explore opportunities in health, careers, gender equality and wider school development.

Volunteering with EPAfrica provides an unforgettable summer, with a chance to experience a hugely different culture and make great friends. The responsibility, opportunities for personal development and vital transferable skills given to Project Workers also provide a strong foundation for a wide variety of future careers.
